Elizabeth Stairing Benjamin 1829-1903

Lycoming Creek 19th Century Commercial Fly Tier

Elizabeth is the earliest-known woman commercial fly tier in the United States, according to a letter written by her son Joseph, in 1934 to AMFF. Just prior to the Civil War she became a legend in the Ralston, PA area by ingeniously creating a series of “wildly successful” fly patterns that caught the eye of the of wealthy city anglers.

Watching other anglers, she observed that trout always jumped for certain types of fls. She believed she could imitate the kinds of insects trout were taking and worked with her husband and son to make nets and catch the aquatic life she would imitate. Feathers collected by her son were shaped by Elizabeth and fastened by hand to fishhooks with different colored silk threads. The wealthy city anglers learned of the success of others who purchased her flies, they paid fabulous prices for all she could make!

Thank you to:

-Austin S. Hogan of Cambridge, MA first curator of the American Museum of Fly Fishing 1970-1978.

Commemorative Fly

Elizabeth Stairing Benjamin Wet Fly

HOOK: Wet fly, size 10 or 12. The old flies were dressed on blind eye hooks (no eye) and snelled onto drawn silkworm gut. If you choose to tie the old style on snells, break or cut the eye off of the hook. You can substitute monofilament of about .012 diameter for the gut snell. Snells were about 4” long with a loop at the end.

THREAD: Black silk or substitute.

BODY: Light orange wool yarn, as dressed by Elizabeth Benjamin.

RIBBING: Four or five turns of narrow flat gold tinsel. Wind this before the palmered hackle!

HACKLE: Brown hackle, palmered (wound around body from back to front) about four or five turns. Finish with about two turns at the throat. Be sure to save room for the wing!

WING: Mallard duck flank section, usually folded once or even twice.

HEAD: Black wool yarn, dubbed onto black thread. OR, just black thread.

Brodhead Creek Heritage Center at ForEvergreen Nature Preserve, 1539 Cherry Lane Road, Analomink, Pa.

At the heart of a natural refuge, open to all, Brodhead Creek Heritage Center is taking shape at ForEvergreen Preserve, Analomink, Pa. With 3,000 square feet of space for environmental displays, education and offices, Brodhead Creek Heritage Center will welcome people of all ages and abilities, connecting them with the natural world around them. The preserve itself protects half a mile of Brodhead Creek, the waters where fly fishing in America was born. The center is scheduled to be completed in October 2018. The Brodhead Creek Heritage Center will hold displays highlighting the angling history of the area like the Henryville House, Hotel Rapids, and Bamboo Fly Rod Maker Louis Schauer from Stroudsburg, PA.

The Brodhead Creek is arguably one of the most historic sites in the development of American fly fishing techniques and tradition. Throughout the 19th and first half of the 20th centuries, virtually all the notable anglers and angling writers visited the Brodhead, a stream that was instrumental in fostering the experimentation that advanced the art, sport, and science of fly fishing for trout. Originally, the Brodhead was called the Analomink meaning “tumbling water.” The two branches of the Brodhead were later called the East and West branches. The West Branch was subsequently named the Paradise Creek. Richard C Hunt, President of the Angler's Club of New York, wrote in the club's 1934 Bulletin, " There are rivers whose names are inseparably linked with the art of angling for trout with a fly, and among them the Test and Itchen, the Beaverkill, the Neversink and the Brodhead, are surrounded by tradition, and have been so beloved by men who have fished them that they are in truth classic streams. And of these classic waters, in this country the Brodhead yields first place to none."
